A Guide To Developing A Child's Emotional Intelligence

Why is it that when one baby cries another will also cry, and when someone can't stop laughing you find yourself laughing as well even though you have no idea why; this is because emotions are contagious. Emotional contagion is where we feel a reflection of someone else's emotions by looking at their expressions and actions. How someone is feeling can be caught, in fact, emotions are more contagious than flu!

It is very easy to think our children will not realize when we are upset or unhappy but actually they are likely to start feeling the same way without knowing why. A good example is when they are being dropped off at school and they start feeling anxious because we are feeling anxious about leaving them.

Developing emotional intelligence in children

So what do parents need to keep in mind about raising an emotionally intelligent child? Here are four parenting tips for childcare that will help develop emotional intelligence in children:

- Observe and label feelings
- Talk about emotions in others
- Validate your child's emotions
- Encourage problem solving

Children have to manage strong emotions on a daily basis and we as parents can teach and coach them in important skills in self-awareness and self-regulation that will build their EQ and emotional success in life.
